Carlos graduated from the National University of San Agustín in Arequipa, Peru. Since 2013, he has participated as a volunteer and associate researcher in the Natural History Museum of that university. He has loved the environment since childhood, making many trips with his mother to nearby forests. While at university, he strengthened his appreciation for nature and decided to dedicate himself to the study of mammals. He participated in some expeditions under the command of different organizations, which led him and a group of friends to form Procarnívoros. During his work there, he managed to obtain new records of Andean cats in Peru, promoting its study and dissemination for the conservation of the species.
